✓ Technology, World Politics and American Policy Victor Basiuk

This is the first comprehensive future-oriented book in international relations to examine systematically technology and its impact using the conceptual instruments of the field. Spanning approximately seventy-five years, until about the year 2050, the broad scope of the book ranges from specific technological projections and their national and international impact to major theoretical questions, such as the nature of world society, societal goals, and the rise and fall of civilizations. The emphasis is on the implications of the findings for American foreign policy. Concrete policy recommendations and possible means for their implementation are provided.

Institute of War and Peace Studies

Victor Basiuk is a consultant in science and technology policy and national security policy in Washington, D.C.

Japanese International Negotiating Behavior Michael Blaker

In this in-depth study Michael Blaker examines patterns in Japanese international negotiations in the half century before Pearl Harbor. Utilizing original Japanese sources, the author analyzes eighteen cases to identify a distinctive Japanese style of bargaining.

The book explores the reasons for Japan's repeated successes at the negotiating table. Refuting the common stereotype of the perfidious Japanese diplomat, the book portrays Japanese prewar international bargaining behavior as consistent and scrutable.

Studies of the East Asian Institute

Michael Blaker is research associate at the East Asian Institute and director of the Project on Japan and the United States in Multilateral Diplomacy, Columbia University.
